Meet the Author

Kellen Hope

Kellen Hope received her BA in Anthropology with a minor in Mediterranean Archaeology and a MA in Museum Studies. She is currently a full-time Collections Care and Preservation Fund Contractor for the Smithsonian Institution, National Air and Space Museum. She joined the Virginia Outdoors Foundation as a 2020 Special Project Fellow to assist with the Jack Dawson Project. As a Virginia Outdoors Foundation (VOF) Fellow and the Head of Collections and Cataloging for this special project, Kellen brought her museum expertise, research prowess, and a keen eye that helped lead the VOF Preserve team through the cataloging of Jack Dawson's home and its contents.

Thanks to Kellen this inventory will forever serve as an important historical and archaeological in situ snapshot of the unique life that was lived by Jack Dawson, within the Bull Run Mountains, between 1917 and 2012.

The Dawson House and Preservation

As with archaeology, many stories or insights can be gained on a person or their culture through their associated belongings or homestead. The story of Jack Dawson can be told through archival documents, oral histories, as well through what is found in his homestead. All three can be supported by one another and they are all necessary for presenting a full story of Jack Dawson. While archival documentation and oral histories are being collected, the items in the house as well as the home overall, must also be examined and documented to help physically present. For starting a new collection, especially one regarding someone's daily life and homestead, it is important to determine what is valuable emotionally and educationally to accurately present that person's life. When going through the house we have come across some objects that are worth keeping telling the story of Jack Dawson, but there are also others that are not necessary to tell his story and can possibly pose a hazard if kept.

Overview of Inventory and Project

Over the period of four working days, a full inventory of the Jack Dawson house was conducted with VOF staff assistance and supervision. For the first two days, handwritten notes were taken of what objects were left in the house, the location, and a short description. These notes were updated into an excel file that records the information of the object title, location found in the house, a specific location if applicable, a description, type of object, and whether the object should be kept or not. How the database can be used is described below. The other working days, photographs were taken of objects in the house to conduct a better description in the inventory as well as to be able to start research on the objects.

Other documents were drafted in a google drive folder regarding specific research on objects, as well as information regarding how to deal with the hazards posed, how to date certain objects, and other information that could be valuable in describing the house and telling the story of Jack Dawson.

This Inventory Report is just one deliverable of the inaugural 2020 VOF Special Project Fellowship that was focused on Jack Dawson and his home site. The other deliverables that accompany this document are a photo essay book and an preliminary oral history report.

How to use the Excel Database

The full inventory of the Jack Dawson house is documented in an excel sheet. This full inventory also includes item and objects that we believe should not be kept, whether they do not tell or are not needed to tell the story of Jack Dawson, or if they are hazardous.

Excel sheets allow for easy sorting by category or headings which is a valuable resource for the collection as well as counting through formulas. For example, a formula in the excel sheet tracks how many objects in the house that we have labeled as 'keep' and we can even specify the formula to give us the total count of objects that we are keeping which are found in the kitchen. Excel, as a data collection method, also can create dropdown lists which allows for standardization and streamlining of the datasets.

This excel sheet contains numerous tabs. The first tab labeled "NEWEST General" is the full inventory which includes all objects. The data collected on this tab is the object name, the object's category, a quick description, the location in the house, a specific location (if applicable), associated photo number, whether the object will be kept or not, and the object number (to be filled out once catalogued as a collection). The second tab, NEWEST Specifics, only pertains to the objects that were determined to be kept. This tab will also condense the total number of objects by grouping objects which are duplicates of one another. The following section will describe this grouping or issue of multiples. This second tab will be detailed and accurate of what was specifically found and less general. This second tab also will have the associated photograph numbers recorded.

How to Deal with Multiples

Around Dawson's house, there are many similar objects or multiples of objects, like the Ball jars and the dining wear. While it is not in our best interest regarding time management to catalog every single item as its own entry, we can group these similar objects as one catalog entry. Say that we have found five spoons: instead of cataloging all five spoons on their own, if they are the same or similar enough, we can make one entry as 'Spoons' with an object count of 5. They can be all stored together and if ever on display, they can be switched out over time or on a rotation. Once the Ball jars are all photographed, they can be dated, inventoried, and then grouped by year, if possible. They can be rotated on display once grouped and cataloged.

Pieces of Linoleum flooring are also found throughout the house can also be grouped together. Depending on the condition or how much material wants to be retained the best example can be kept as a representative.

About This Report

This report will give a detailed inventory of the objects in the Dawson house that were determined to be valuable to be kept which tell his story. The information for this report was gathered from the first and second tab of the Excel database. A general count of objects will be given and then broken down by category. The detailed inventory will have a page dedicated to each object with its title, a photograph (if available), description, object count, associated photograph numbers (if available), and any historical information that was found through research. The objects labeled as 'maybe' are not included in this detailed inventory but can be found in the excel sheet.

General Count

Objects Overall

In total, there are approximately 526 objects associated with the Dawson house. This total includes all objects whether they are labeled in the keep column as 'yes', 'maybe', or 'no'.

Objects to Keep

For the objects labeled in the keep column as 'yes' there are about 338 objects.

Objects to Not Keep

There are 64 objects that are labeled as to not be kept.

Categories

Below is a general count of the total objects inside the house, broken into categories, including those that are indicated as to maybe keep and to not keep.

General Information

Possible Hazards

In general, we should avoid taking in (or rid ourselves of) objects that are hazardous in nature. One of the most hazardous things I believe that are in the house are the batteries inside the electronics and remote controls. While it is important to have the electronics and controls themselves, it is not necessary to have the batteries unless you would want the electronics to be operational. One of the remotes appears to be the most worrisome. One of the remotes on the side table near the front door has a large stain surrounding it which could indicate that the battery acid has seeped out of the batteries or that the batteries are actively corroding. This hazard was not fully investigated at the time of the inventory, but it is one to take note of. If there are batteries that are present in the house, they are likely over nine years old and should be disposed of properly. Once the batteries are removed, the electronics can still be kept and act as a demonstration or prop of Dawson's daily life or activities.

Another possible hazard are the food and medicine items that are still present in the house. Like the batteries, once the contents are removed, the containers of these items can be retained. As an example, there are three large cans of green beans that are actively corroding and spilling their contents onto the floor. While it will be important to document these items, these are the types of items that can be easily replaced. A new can of beans can be bought, or even better, an empty can of the same brand and size beans can be found and used as a replacement for the degrading cans found in the house. The same idea can be applied to the medicine found in the house. Once the contents are removed, the bottles and boxes can be kept, especially if the bottles are old or are important in documenting and telling about his health (without violating HIPPA rules).

Other hazards in this house are pest control related, like aerosol cans of pesticides and open packages of poisons. These were likely not put into place by Dawson and were likely added after his death. These do not necessarily pertain to Dawson's story and should be removed from the house. They can also be replaced if deemed necessary.

Another possible hazard that may need to be taken care of are the amounts of loose insulation lying around in the attic. While Dawson likely installed this insulation and it was important to make his home habitable, it is not serving a purpose currently and the fiberglass particles could be harmful. I think it would be important for us to save a small section of the insulation that is in the best condition and have the rest thrown out due to this possible issue.

Along the lines of keeping items, it is valuable to keep those that can show a historic timeline or demonstrate a certain point in history. Over time, companies can change their logos and through these changes, items can be dated based upon the logo that is used. It would be valuable to look to the logos found on the objects around the house and to try to date these items. The jar manufacturing company, Ball, is a company that is often referenced as one that can be dated through its changes to their logo. Due to the amount of Ball jars found in the house, this could offer some insight to when Dawson had purchased, obtained, or used these jars. Canning appeared to be an important aspect in Dawson's life through oral histories, so this would be an interesting project to determine when he was actively canning.

The manufacturing label on dining wear can also be dated, especially if the stamp is present and legible. Some of the textured plates and mugs have been able to be dated to around 1965 based upon the manufacturing label and the design of the dining wear. This dating can also be done for some of the clothing found in Dawson's house. The logos for the company brands as well as the types of clothing lines can also be dated.

Interesting Notes about the house

Phone Numbers

There are two phone numbers found around the house. Above the kitchen door it says: "Jimmy Edwards 703-368-5063" and on the back of the kitchen door to the living room it says "540 722 1125"

Mouse Skeletons

There is a total of 9 mouse skeletons found in the kitchen and in the white tub below the hand wash station.

Snake Skins

There were 8 snake skins found in the attic or upstairs area of the house.

What We Can Learn from the House about Dawson

Everyday Activities

Dawson's everyday life, and his former presence, can be seen around the house. On the kitchen door frame from outside, there is a dark stain on one part of the frame. The positioning of this stain indicates that Dawson likely held onto the frame for support while walking in or out the door. His hand washing station is right next to this door, so he likely came in, bracing himself as he entered, and washed his hands at his station. Another one of these handprint stains can be seen on the doorframe between the living room and the kitchen. This was likely another area where he stabilized or supported himself on the daily. Dawson's boots and clothing are also another reminder of his everyday life. An interesting thing that we noticed while examining and photographing Dawson's boots was that all on the sole of the shoes, the outside edges of the heel were very worn. This could help show how he walked, likely walking on the outside of his feet. Based on this article, he could have had a supinated (or under pronated) gait.

Dawson, the Craftsman

Jack Dawson's craftsmanship work can be seen all over his home. The entire addition to the house in the back behind the kitchen was made by him and this should be highlighted in telling his story. Throughout the house, there are numerous wood pieces or wooden beams which he likely used as to repair and create pieces around his house. In the upstairs area above the kitchen, the dividing wall between the two attic rooms was removed to open up the space. This was likely done by Dawson himself, and parts of the wall remain in the room. Dawson's renovations can also be seen in the house through pieces of removed walls, doors, cabinets, and windows scattered about the house. In the backroom alone, there are about three doors that are not being used as doors. A screen door and a wood door lean against the shared kitchen wall while a large wooden door has been used as part of the wall. As mentioned earlier, he likely handcrafted the doghouse for his dog and the small animal carrier currently stowed under the house. Upstairs, there was a small side table that was found that appears to be handmade and could have possibly been crafted by Dawson. It is a small, handmade side table with dovetailed siding and hand carved legs (otherwise known as hand hewn). During the initial inventory, it could not be determined whether this object was crafted by Dawson.

Making Use of What He Had

Due to the isolation of where he lived, Dawson often did repairs on his house with what was available to him. Tin sheets are found laying out by the doghouse and these sheets are also seen up against the sides of the house, shielding the exposed area beneath the addition of the house. Along the backside of the house, small round tin disks or jar lids can be seen nailed to the siding of the house likely to patch holes. This was clearly work done by Dawson himself to help maintain and do upkeep on his home. Lines of caulk can also be seen along the siding on the back of the house. A canister of caulk was found in one of the drawers in the kitchen, and while it was initially something that was believed to be thrown away later, it is actually an item that should be kept due to its use in repairs and upkeep.

On the front porch, metal rods can be seen supporting the edge of the roof. These appear to have been added by Dawson to keep the roof functioning and together. These white metal rods can also be seen throughout the house as curtain rods and there is also a small, unused pile in the room above the kitchen.

In the rooms upstairs, small pieces of fabric or cloth can be seen wedged into the wooden slats of the walls. Dawson likely used these pieces of fabric as insulation or to fill holes in the wood. While insignificant on their own, these materials in their specific context help tell Dawson's story about life out in the mountains.

Around the house there are cardboard boxes full of newspapers. It would be interesting to determine whether these newspapers were kept for a certain reason or if they were not. It would be interesting to see if they were possibly used as a starter for a fire or whether they were used as possible insulation for the house.

Future Steps

Once the transfer of the home and collection is finalized, the collection can officially be obtained and treated as a collection. The story or mission of the Dawson House, in terms of the overall preserve, should be determined before official decisions are made on what should be kept or not kept. This inventory only offers an opinion from an outside perspective and what can be done or determined regarding what I have been told or believe can be told to tell the story of Jack Dawson. It is important to determine the mission and what story you want to tell, because this decision will direct what should be kept in the collection and what would not be necessary to keep.

After the final collection is determined, official identifying photographs can be taken of the objects and object numbers can be assigned. It is recommended to record this information, take measurements of the objects, and note the condition of the objects. Noting the condition can allow you to choose the best representative to be displayed. At this point, it is also important to record why this object is important to the story or mission. Many of these objects are covered in dirt, dust, and possible pest feces so it would also be important for these objects to be treated or cleaned by a conservator or seek consultation regarding cleaning the objects.

More research on the specific objects found within the house can be continued to add to the story of Jack Dawson. Once the collection is paired with oral histories, many more stories can be told regarding Jack Dawson and his life in the Bull Run Mountains.
